Catching a monster pike

By JERROD VILA

The Northern Pike. There have always been numerous large pike caught through the ice on the Great Sacandaga Lake, but this last year seemed to be exceptionally stellar in that aspect. Rightfully so, as the GSL held the world record for many years and still harbors the ranking of the largest Northern Pike ever taken in the United States.
Could another world record be contained in the lake so close to home? Sure, why couldn’t it.

From March 1 until the closing of Pike Season is, in my opinion, the single best time to get on true monsters.

In a nutshell, I run a large dead bait program this time of year; I feel as though the biomass of any given body of water changes throughout the winter where as now there is an abundance of dead or dying fish/baitfish contained within the ecosystem of each lake as oxygen levels reach there lowest points of the year due to ice thickness and snow cover yielding a very a minimal amount of sunlight penetration and severely inhibiting the photosynthesis process of underwater weed beds.

As these big females come in and begin to stage in front of inlets for pre-spawn they shift from a high metabolism apex predator in the fall or a first ice situation, cruising shallow bays then transitioning to a gluttonous opportunistic scavenger capitalizing on any available forage with zero expenditure of energy to catch it.

Targeting inlets, I tend to look for water eight to 12 feet deep and set a large (7-to-10 inch) bait around halfway to two-thirds of the way down the water column. Generally suspended higher than you would normally set live bait, for whatever the reason may be this suspension technique has been much better than either laying dead bait on or near bottom. Suckers, smelt, cisco, etc, they will all work.

The law regarding the use of dead bait is a fairly grey connotation: “Any dead fish, or parts thereof excluding eggs, that are legal to possess and are not prohibited for use as bait (see above) that have been packaged for commercial sale and have been preserved by methods other than by freezing only (e.g., salted minnows) can be used in any water body where it is legal to use fish as bait and do not require a receipt. Each package of dead bait fish must be individually labeled, identifying the name of the packager/processor, the name of the species, the quantity of fish contained, and the means of preservation,” according to the New York State Department of Environmental Conservation’s General Regulations Guide.

What I gather from this is pretty much if any dead bait you are using has been salted or preserved you are good to go.

It is really just a waiting game that you have to be willing to play. It’s one of those days where you wait and wait, for quite possibly nothing, but when it happens its game on. There is no wondering, “ Hmm, did that big live sucker trip my flag?” The answer is obviously not. Getting a flag while running large dead bait is a heck of a rush. There is really only one possibility of what could be on the other end. The only question is … how big?
